

Limiting beliefs

The 4 Steps to Shifting People's Beliefs

1. Identify
2. Clarify
3. Reframe
4. Close the Loop

Why we need to reframe limiting beliefs

The way people talk to us is how they talk to themselves. If we then notice a pattern that is preventing the person from making a change in their life, it is our job to shift that mindset and give them new perspectives.

People think by talking, if we can change the way they talk to us, we can shift their beliefs.

They will have stories about how they can't do something. If we can show them that this is just something they tell themselves and reveal that what they "can't" is actually a "won't/won't" then we put them in a position where they can choose to take action or not.

Identify

Be alert and try to identify these beliefs as early as possible

- Skeptical
- They think everything is a scam
- Have been scammed before
- Don't believe what people say
- "Works for others, not for me"
- Money
- I don't have the money now, therefore I can't get help
- Problem: Not willing to be resourceful
- The problem is not: That they don't have the money

- Things aren't that bad after all
- Big ego
- Minimizes their pain as a shield to protect ego
- People change what they do because of pain and fear of future pain, they simply haven't accepted the pain yet
- Blaming
- Don't want to accept that they themselves are the problem
- Therefore blame external things like finances, other people, etc.
- Haven't realized that winners win even under bad circumstances
- Believe that things will happen by themselves
- They have no sense of urgency
- Believe that everything will fix itself
- They don't want to accept that only they have the power to change things
- Wishful thinking language
- They haven't realized that they have to do a certain thing to reach their goal
- Or that they haven't realized that they have to reach their goal
- Instead, they use words like "would be good", "I wish", "I hope that..."
- They have never thought about the real consequences that happen if they don't do something
- People get what they need - often not what they want
- I'll do this, but not now
- Just means they're not serious enough
- Their seriousness hasn't been tested - they have never thought through the consequences
- Research mode
- They have Analysis paralysis which stops them from taking the step

Clarify

Find out if what you believe is right. Ask questions and dig deeper.

Take your time and understand where they are coming from. They will not agree to you changing the way they see things if they do not feel you understand them.

Reframe

Ask permission first or ask a confusing question

"Is it okay if I share a perspective?"

"What if it was not what you think it is..."

Step 1 - change the sentence

Make them see something that in their mind is negative as something positive/neutral. You take a step back to see the whole picture and lay out all the potential advantages and disadvantages to their belief.

Step 2 - change the reasons

Make them realize how the reason for their small problem does not have to hinder their decision.

Step 3 - Analogies

Draw an analogy between their excuse/situation and a new perspective. This affects how they see the value/importance of the belief.

Step 4 - change logical levels

Move the conversation from specific events/problems/details to something more abstract. E.g. values, identity and purpose.

A good example is to connect to identity and ask what the winning version of themselves would do in this situation given everything you just talked about.

Close the loop

"Tie the bag" as in a Swedish text

Ask them if it is okay to assume from now on that we see things in the new way.

Remember this when you ask new questions - when you ask consequence/future questions e.g.
